GERÍMBÓC

The Anglo-Saxon Calendar (OE gerimbóc “year’s counting book”) is divided into twelve months (OE mónað, “measurement of a moon”) and two seasons of winter and summer. The winter begins on the first full moon of our modern October, and the summer begins on the first full moon of Easter’s month. White Marsh Theod celebrates eight seasonal holytides. Two tides (Geól and Liða) are determined by the astrological phenomena of the winter and summer solstices, and are fixed. The remaining tides are mutable, generally fluctuating within a week or so every year, and are often based upon observations of nature (first bud of flowers, first cardinal of the season, etc.). They consist of the three “planting tides” and three “harvest tides” and correspond roughly to the ancient agricultural cycle of England.

It must be noted that these are holytides and not holidays (holy days). The tribe gathers together to celebrate the holiday of each holy tide, usually the zenith of the tide. Example: The Geól tide begins at the end of the Hallows tide, but its holiday is celebrated at the height of the tide (Dec. 21st) not at its beginning (around November 2nd).
